THE HDTV EXPO SETS OUT TO SOLVE CUSTOMER CONFUSION ABOUT HDTV

HDTV Magazine and Affinity Marketing Team-up to Launch a Nationwide Series of Seminars to Educate Consumers about HDTV and the Digital Transition

CEDIA, DENVER, CO -- September 16, 2006 -- HDTV Magazine and Affinity Marketing, LLC have announced today at the CEDIA Trade Show in Denver, CO that their companies have joined forces to host a continuing series of events around the U.S. called ...The HDTV Expo. These events are to be totally consumer oriented and focused on the digital transition and new television technology.

Dale Cripps, founder and co-publisher of HDTV Magazine, said, "These are the first events of their kind dedicated to comprehensive consumer education about HDTV, compatible products and the total switch to all digital TV broadcasting (by law) in February 2009. Exhibits and classes will be open to the public for free. Government agencies, the Consumer Electronics Association (CEA), major manufacturers, and others have all called for a unified effort to smooth the path to this 'watershed event' in U.S. television history. Three HDTV Expo's are being planned to coincide with the 2006 holiday selling season, and there will be others held in up to 50 television markets in 2007 and 2008."

Ron Bruce, CEO and President of Affinity Marketing, LLC, said, "We are pleased to be involved with Dale Cripps and HDTV Magazine. Dale is considered a leading pioneer in the HDTV movement. If there is anyone who can get everyone to rally around The HDTV Expo, he certainly can." Bruce added, "There is no question that there is an urgent need for consumer education about HDTV and the digital television transition, and that is what we are about."

Bruce continued, "At the fourth annual Display Search HDTV Conference in Beverly Hills, CA (Aug. 15-16, 2006), Sony Electronics President Stan Glasgow told the audience at the Beverly Hilton, 'Some of us have confused ourselves as to what's going on (regarding HDTV). You can imagine how consumers are feeling'. Panasonic Chief Technology Officer, Paul Liao said, 'Consumers routinely misunderstand the benefits and features of HDTV, such as improved resolution, color and brightness'. According to a July 2006 Panasonic survey, 25% of respondents thought that an HDTV automatically included high-definition pictures on all channels, and 30% said that they had no idea what to do with a new HDTV after opening the packaging. They, 'really do need a lot of help', Liao said." And both executives say they would like to help. Both Bruce and Cripps said, "With the costs for serving a confused and bewildered market about to skyrocket we must call upon the entire spectrum of those involved in the digital TV transition to support The HDTV Expo. Broadcasters, HDTV manufacturers and the producers of HDTV programming content all need to get involved."

In addition, Brad Anderson, Vice-Chairman/CEO of Best Buy said, "There will be explosive sales (in HDTVs) as we approach 2009...it is important to have a path - a graceful path - to get everyone there."

The HDTV Expo event organizer and VP of Business Development at Affinity Marketing, Chris Walczak said, "We are that 'graceful path' to which Mr. Anderson at Best Buy refers. We are excited about providing the best forum for consumers to learn more about HDTV choices; available HDTV content; connection options; and, compatible components. Our creatively planned advertising, promotion and strong collaboration with industry leaders will guarantee success at all of our venues."

Mr. Walczak continued, "In each city, all around the U.S., The HDTV Expo will provide a rotating array of educational classes presented by industry experts to both new HDTV prospects and existing HDTV owners. We want consumers to see demonstrations of the various display technologies and help them make good buying decisions in a 'no-pressure' environment. We believe that The HDTV Expo will serve all the various stakeholders in the transition to all digital TV in February 2009. Studies show that consumers who talk directly to manufacturer reps are a lot more likely to be loyal to those products and purchase them above other brands." Mr. Walczak concluded by saying, "Certainly no manufacturer wants returns due to ill-informed consumers or sales people. That is why we are inviting all HDTV retail sales reps in our selected cities to attend our classes for free as well."
